Band (bænd), sb 1, also 5 6 bande [Late 15th c bande, a F bande = Pr, Sp, It banda, app adopted from Teutonic (cf OHG bant, OS, ON band see Band sb 1 also Goth bandi see Bind sb 1) The word received in Romanic a new develop ment of sense, not found in Teutonic, with which it has since been taken back, not only into Eng., but also into Ger (bande) and Du (bende, formerly bande), the adoption being facilitated by its obvious connexion with the native words In Eng, where the pre-existing Band sb 1 was synonymous with bend, the present word was, by confusion with these, also often written bend So also in mod Du bende for bande, by assoc with a native bende see Bend sb 1

The actual history of banda in this sense, and its relation to the Teutonic forms are not without uncertainty, owing to our ignorance at present of its age, and to the fact that It, Sp, Pg banda, F bande, are found also as synonyms of benda, bende fascia (which, except in It they have now indeed superseded), while conversely Littré's earliest example of bande 'troop' is spelt bende, thus showing at least form association between the two words. And some actually identify them Du Cange says that the company of soldiers formed by Alfonso of Castille was called a banda, from the red banda or ribbon worn by them as a sash and the red of the Focale della Croce Ordinis militiæ as 'Company of soldiers, because originally distinguished by a banda or band of cloth of a certain colour But Littré refers banda, bande 'troop' to late L. bandum Banner, and Du Cange shows med. L. bandus in sense both of fascia, and of 'company of men collected under a certain leader or banner,' thus associating all three notions. Whatever the original source, it is evident that the popular feeling associated benda, banda, 'fascia, stripe, sash, scarf, ribbon, banda, 'company, troop and bandum 'banner']

1 a Originally, a knight able and entitled to bring a company of vassals into the field under his own banner, and who ranked next to a baron and above other knights in this sense commonly used substantively, as a title of rank or dignity, and contrasted with knight, though sometimes with bachelor b Subsequently, the title and rank were co ferred for valiant deeds done in the king's presence on the field of battle (perhaps, also, on other occasions or for other grounds), and, with the decay of the feudal system, came to constitute merely a rank or order of knighthood in this use occur both banneret and knight banneret, the latter opposed to knight bachelor On the institution of the order of baronets in 1611, precedence was given to these over all bannerets 'except such as were made in the field, under the banner, the king being present,' and after this the order of knights-bannerets was allowed to die out

Note The original sense was mainly French, 'in England there were few tenants bringing any considerable number of men who were not of the rank of the barons (Penny Cycl) the first recorded instance of use b is in the 15th year of Edward III, when John de Copeland was made a banneret for his capture of King David Bruce at Neville's Cross. In the claim of Baronets to precedency (in 1612 it is said 'there are not Bannerets now in being and perad venture never shall be, and although the title has been claimed for certain persons knighted since that day, heraldic authorities do not admit the validity of the claim. See the matter discussed in Nicolas Hist Knighthood (1842) I pp xxxii xliii In later times an explanation of the name was sought either in its being conferred on the field 'under the banner or in the alleged fact that at its bestowal the knight's pennon was symbolically cut square to banner shape

Bark, barque (bărk), *sb*2 Forms 5–7 barke, 5– barque, 6–bark [a F barque, 15th c. ad Pr., Sp, or It barca –L barca (in Paulinus Nolanus c 400) Not in OFr, where the word used was barge

Barge and bark are probably identical in origin and possibly from Celtic, Thurneysen shows that OIr barc (a fem. a stem) may, if native, represent an original barcā*, with dialectal by form barca*, which would satisfactorily account at once for OF barge, and the common Romanic barca Diez takes barca as an early syncopated variant of the conjectural bārica* mentioned under BARGE, but as barca occurs c 400 and bārica* not at all this is improbable

As to the original meaning, Isidore, c 640, says 'Barca est, quae cuncta navis commercia ad litus portat. Hanc navis in pelago propter minimas undas suo suscipit gremio.' So Florio (1598) explains It. barca as 'a barke, boate, wherrie, or lighter', ed. 1611 has 'any kinds of Barke, Barge, or Boate', Minsheu (1623) explains Sp. barca as 'a great boat, a barke, a skiffe, a hoarse boat'; and Cotgr (1611) has Fr barque 'a barque, little ship, great boat.' Cf. BARGE sb 2–4. The barca was thus apparently, originally, a large ship a boat, used as a lighter, on the Mediterranean, the name continued to be applied to an open boat, even while extended to a small vessel with sails, the latter was the sense with which the word was taken from French into English, and which it still retains both in general and specific use, but in the end of 16th c, the more primitive sense of 'large rowing boat, barge,' was reintroduced from the languages of the Mediterranean]

Battel, obs form of BATTLE

Battel (bæt'l), sb As a separate word only in pl battels, also 4 †batails, 8 battles, 9 bat tells [Of uncertain origin in 16th c L. batillis, battillis, in the Laudian Statutes batellæ The etymology of this, with its associated vb, and deriv batteler, has been the subject of abundant conjecture Much depends on the original sense at Oxford: if this was 'food, provisions,' it is natural to connect it with BATTLE v.³ to feed, receive nourishment, cf esp BATTLING vbl sb.¹, explained by Sherwood (1632) as 'vivres, manger, morche' But conclusive evidence that battels had this sense is wanting, while already before 1600 it had that of 'debita' cuius due to the college for provisions, etc The verb however appears to have been sometimes used for 'to take or receive provisions' i e from the college buttery, which brings us close to the senses of BATTLE v.¹ 'to feed, take nourishment' Cf also the Eton use, and Winchester battlings On the other hand, sense 3 of the vb (of the same word) suggests the idea of contributing to a common fund or stock compare the terms 'commons' and 'commoner.' See BATTELER

Taking 'accounts or 'score as the original sense some have conjectured battel to be a dimin of BAT sb.¹ or of F batte, with sense of little staff or stick, whence perhaps 'tally stick But nothing appears in med L, OF, or Eng to support this conjecture Reference to Du betaelen (= bezahlen to pay) or to possibility of battels arising out of a misreading of bacills little sticks, do not fall within the limits of scientific etymology]

† 1 See quot (Perhaps a distinct word) Obs c 1400 Apol Lollt 76 To cry þis day agennis þe multitude of lawis of þe kirk agen batails, agen reseruacouns, agen furst fruits, & oþer spolingis of goodis of þe kirk

The word has apparently undergone progressive extensions of application owing partly to changes in the internal economy of the colleges. Some Oxford men of a previous generation state that it was customary for them to apply to the buttery accounts alone or even to the provisions ordered from the buttery as distinct from the 'commons supplied from the kitchen but this latter use is disavowed by others. See the quotations and cf those under BATTELER and BATTELLER, which bear that battels applied in 17 18th c to provisions supplied to members of the college individually at their own order and cost i e to batteleers who had no commons, but were charged their 'battels only, and to commoners as extras above the ordinary stint of their appointed commons but whether the battels were originally the provisions themselves, or the sums due on account of them, must at present be left undecided

Be (bī), v [An irregular and defective verb, the full conjugation of which in modern Eng is effected by a union of the surviving inflexions of three originally distinct and independent verbs, viz (1) the original Aryan substantive verb with stem es, Skr as, 's-, Gr 'ασ-, L es 's-, OTeut es-*, 's-, (2) the verb with stem wes-, Skr vas- to remain OTeut wes Gothic wis an to remain, stay, continue to be, OS, OE, OHG wesan, Ofris wes a, ON ver a, (3) the stem beu- Skr bhu, bhav, Gr φυ-, L fu, OTeut beu*, beo, OE bío n to become, come to be Of the stem es, OE (like the oldest extant Teutonic) possessed only the present tenses, Indicative and Subjunctive (orig Optative), all the other parts being supplied from the stem wes, pa t was, which, though still a distinct and complete vb in Gothic, was in OE only supplemental to es, the two constituting the substantive verb am was Bío n, le, was still in OE a distinct verb (having all the present but no past tenses) meaning to 'become, come to be', and thus often serving as a future tense to am was By the beginning of the 13th c, the Infinitive and Participle, Imperative, and pres Subjunctive of am was, became successively obsolete, the corresponding parts of be taking their place so that the whole verb am was be is now commonly called from its infinitive, 'the verb to le, although be is no part of the substantive verb originally but only a later accretion replacing original parts now lost

In OE the present Indic of am had two forms of the plural, (1) sind, sindon (=Goth and Ger sind L sunt, Skr s-anti) and earon, aron (ON eru) the latter confined to the Anglian dialects where it was used side by side with sind, un Of these, sind on ceased to be used before 1250, its place being taken in southern Eng by the corresponding inflexions of be We, ye they leth ben, be were the standard forms in southern and midl Eng for centuries, and even in the sing be, beest, beth began to encroach on am, ast is and are now the regular forms in southern dialect speech Meanwhile aron earon, arn are, survived in the north and gradually spread south till early in 16th c are made its appearance in standard Eng where it was regularly used by Tindale Be continued in concurrent use till the end of the century (see Shakspere and Bible of 1611), and still occurs as a poetic archaism as well as in certain traditional expressions and familiar quotations of 16th c origin as 'the powers that be' But the regular modern Eng plural is are which now tends to oust be even from the subjunctive Southern and eastern dialect speech retains be both in singular and plural, as I be a going, 'we be ready]

In treating this important word the history of the inflexions is first exhibited, and then that of the signification

B Signification and uses

[The primary sense appears to have been that of branch II below, 'to occupy a place' (1 e to sit, stand, lie, etc) in some specified place, thence the more abstract branch I was derived by abstracting the notion of particular place, so as to emphasize that of actual existence, 'to be some where, no matter where, to be in the universe, or realm of fact, to have a place among existing things, to exist' Branch III was derived from II by weakening the idea of actual presence, into the merely intellectual conception of 'having a place' in a class of notions, or 'being identical with' another notion 'centaurs are imaginary creatures' = 'centaurs have their place in the class of creatures of the imagination' Branch IV is an obvious extension of III of 'it was annoying to me,' with 'it was annoying me']

Be, variant of BEE sb

Be, obs and dial form of BY prep , see next

Be- prefix —OF be, weak or stressless form of the prep and adv bi (big), BY The original Teut form was as in Gothic, bi, with short vowel, prob cognate with second syllable of Gr ἀμφί, L ambi, in OHG and early OE, when it had the stress, as a separate word, and in composition with a noun it was lengthened to bī (bī, bī), while the stressless form, in composition with a vb or indeclinable word, remained bi-, in later OL, as in MHG and mod G, the latter was obscured to be (also occasional in OF as an unaccented form of the preposition) cf OL bi genu practice, bi gangan be gangan, to practise In early MF the etymological bi-, by- regularly reappeared in comp as the stressless form, but in later times be- was finally restored (On the other hand, be was used by northern writers as the separate prep, as still in mod Sc) In modern use, the unaccented prefix is always be-, the accented form by- (some times spelt bye) occurs in one or two words descended from OE as by law, by-word (OL bilage, bi word), and in modern formations on the adv, as by gone, ly name, ly play, ly road, by stander

The original meaning was 'about' In prepositions and adverbs this is weakened into a general expression of position at or near, as in before (at, near, or towards the front), behind, below, beneath, benorth, besouth, between, beyond With verbs, various senses of 'about' are often distinctly retained, as in be bind be come (= come about) be delve be gird, be set be-stir In such as be daub, be spatter, be stir, be strew, the notion of 'all about all round, over,' or 'throughout,' naturally intensifies the sense of the verb, whence, be- comes to be more or less a simple intensive, as in be muddle, be-crowd, be-grudge, be-break or specializes or renders figurative, as in befall (to fall as an accident), be come, be get, be gin, behave, be hold, be lieve In other words the force of be passes over to an object, and renders an intransitive verb transitive, as in be-speak (speak about, for, or to), be flow (flow about), be lie, be moan, be-think, be-wail Hence it is used to form transitive vbs on adjectives and substantives, as in dim be dim, fool be-fool, madam be madam, also others, in which the sb stands in an instrumental or other oblique relation, as be-night 'to overtake with night,' be guile, be-witch Of these a special section consists of verbs having a privative force, as OE belandian, behæfdian, to deprive of one's land, one's head cf bereave, and OE benæm an to take away Finally, be- is prefixed with a force combining some of the preceding, to ppl adjs, as in be-jewelled, be-daughtered

Be- being still in some of its senses (esp 2, 6, 7 below) a living element, capable of being prefixed wherever the sense requires it, the derivatives into which it enters are practically unlimited in number The more important, including those that are in any way specialized, or that require separate explanation, are treated in their alphabetical places as Main Words (In the case of ME words in be-, by, all that survived long enough to have BE- appear under this spelling, a few that became obsolete at an early date are left under their only extant form in BI, BY) Those of less importance, infrequent (often single) occurrence, and obvious composition, are arranged under the following groups (in which, however, the senses tend to overlap each other, so as to make the place of some of the words ambiguous) —

1 Forming derivative verbs, with sense of 'around' a all round externally, on all sides, all over the surface, as in BESET, BESMEAR, b from side to side (within a space), to and fro, in all directions, in all ways, in or through all its parts, thoroughly, as in BESTIR, bejumble (Some of these formations appear only in the pa pple)

3 Forming derivative verbs with privative meaning 'off, away,' as in BEBEAL, BENIM, BEREAVE A very common use of be- in OE and ME, probably originating in words like BE SHEAR, 'to cut all round,' whence 'to cut off or away', but no longer in living use in forming new derivatives

4 Making verbs transitive, by adding a prepositional relation primarily 'about,' as in BE-SPEAK, speak about (or for, to), BE-MOAN, moan about (or over), which sense can usually be detected under the various against, at, for, to, on, upon, over, by, etc required by modern idiom

7 Forming participial adjectives, which unite the preceding senses, esp 6 and 2, in the notion of 'covered or furnished with,' usually in a conspicuous, ostentatious unnecessary, or overdone way. In modern use (e g with Carlyle) the force of the be- is often merely rhetorical, expressing depreciation, ridicule or raillery on the part of the speaker, towards the appendage or ornamentation in question, cf booted and bebooted, garlanded begarlanded, rugged bewrugged. Some of these words have no form without be-, and closely approach the verbs in 5, e g bedaughtered, bepilgrimed 'overrun with pilgrims'. This is now the most frequent use of be-, and the formations of this kind are endless e g bebelted beblonded, becorneted, becupolaed, bediamonded, befathered, beflogged be flounced, bemitred, bemushined, bepearlwigged bepurbonned, berunglelted, besleeved, beturbaned, be uncled, bewinged. 44. The various forms of the pa pple had formerly no distinction of sense In the earlier part of the 17th c, these were borne (usual), born bore (rare) About 1660, borne (the only spelling in Shaksp folio of 1623) was generally abandoned, and born (cf torn worn) retained in all senses, with bore as a frequent variant (the latter perhaps not in sense of natus) Dr Johnson, in his various edd from 1751 to 1773, says under Bear part pass bore or born,' and the same is found in other dicts and grammars of the period But c 1774, a different usage (which some writers or printers had observed as early as 1750) was established bore (common in Addison, Swift, Thomson) was abandoned, borne was reinstated, and now used as the ordinary form, and born was restricted to a specific sense Thus, borne is now the only pa pple, active or passive, in senses 1–42 (he has borne a burden, the tree has borne fruit, the testimony borne by him) it is also used in sense 43 in the active always, and in the passive with by and name of the mother, that is when it has the literal sense of 'brought forth' Born is used only in sense 43, and there only in the passive, when not followed by by and the mother, it has rather a neuter signification – 'come into existence, sprung' without explicit reference to maternal action, hence it is the form used adjectively, and figuratively Cf 'She had borne several children, the children borne to him by this woman, born of the Virgin Mary, born in a stable, her first born son, a lady born, new born zeal, a flower born to blush unseen.'
